"The neighborhood is getting less and less desirable!" said Goonda gloomily, looking out of the window.

"What do you mean, dear?" asked J. Evil Scientist, glancing up from his favorite magazine Werewolf's World!

"Why, all those new houses they're building around here are spoiling everything!" replied Goonda. "They're paving all those nice muddy streets, putting lights in our dark alleys, and worst of all they're going to drain that wonderful swamp where we have had so many happy picnics!"

"What can we do about it?" said J. Evil.

"We could move!" answered Goonda.

"Move!" exclaimed J. Evil. "Not after all the work we went to making this place so homely and uncomfortable!"

"Why can't we look around?" asked Goonda.

J. Evil was agreeable to that; so they set out to find a new homesite.

First, they looked at property near the city dump, but they were discouraged to see there was a Dump Beautification Project in progress. Shade trees were growing among piles of old tin cans, and petunias were blooming on ash heaps. Morning-glory vines were twining in and out of old bedsprings, and everywhere was the scent of roses.

"Oh, no!" shuddered Goonda. "They have spoiled our beautiful dump! I could never stand to live near it now!"

"Neither could I!" agreed J. Evil. "And, we better get out of here! The smell of those flowers is making your face turn an ugly, healthy pink color!"

They drove through other parts of town, but every neighborhood they visited seemed to have something good about it — which was bad for their tastes.

After many fruitless hours, Goonda and J. Evil decided to give up.

"Let's face it," said J. Evil, wearily, "we'll never find another neighborhood as bad as ours used to be."

"I think you are right," sighed Goonda. "Do you remember the first night we spent in our old, miserable house?"

"How can I forget it?" smiled J. Evil. "There was the loveliest thunderstorm; and to make it all completely and wonderfully awful, we had earthquakes and fog for two weeks afterward! What glorious memories!"

"Stop it!" choked Goonda. "I think I am going to cry! Oh, if we could only relive that experience just once more."

"And why not?" exclaimed J. Evil. "I've got a little machine in my lab that can whip up a mean thunderstorm, and with a few adjustments I'll be able to add some fog and an earthquake or two!"

They hurried home, and J. Evil got busy. Shortly, everything was ready, and with a gleeful beam in his eye, J. Evil pressed a button and stepped back.

"One thunderstorm coming up!" he cried. "Followed by earthquakes and fog!"

In short order the skies darkened, the lightning flashed, thunder roared, and the rain came down in torrents. The earth shook, making every timber in the old house creak and groan. Soon after, a clammy, choking fog closed in.

"This is wonderful!" gushed Goonda. "I haven't been so happily unhappy in ages!"

The next day Goonda looked out of the window and gasped. "Look!" she cried. "The people who were building those new houses are leaving!"

Sure enough, the builders were packing their tools and materials. A big sign was being erected on the site. It read: DUE TO CIRCUMSTANCES BEYOND OUR CONTROL, THIS PROJECT IS BEING ABANDONED!

"Hmmm!" mused J. Evil. "Real people sure are funny. I wonder what on earth made them change their minds so suddenly!"
